ANTI - COMINTERN PACT

- . That clears up one difficulty which I had.
- A. No. I think that what you perhaps are thinking of is originally when the Fuehrer first wanted to have good relations with Japan.
- Q. Yes.
- A. This was then more from the "eltanschuungs standpoint, and perhaps what you are thinking of is the anti-comintern pact, which I think was closed, it may have been 1936, I am not quite sure.
- Q. I think the date is December, 1936.
- But that was more of a Weltanschauungs pact, which was closed against the propagands of Bolshevism and so on, which was closed, I think, first with Japan, and later Italy joined, and then, of course, later during the war a number of other states joined it, but that was anti-Comintern. That had nothing to do with the United States then.
- Q. You describe it as Weltanschaulich and at the same time as being anti-Russian.
- Anti-Bolshevik, anti-Communistic, against activities of what we called the Comintern, which was working in Moscow and had branches, secret or open, practically all over the world. Then, you see, especially also in Germany.
- Q. It is very interesting, of course, I have been under the impression that it was not only the Weltanschauung, in the manner that you speak of, but was a factor in the balance of power.
- well, I don't think one can say that. It was really, in the first place, a Weltanschauung matter. At the same time, of course, you know, we had a very strong anti-Bolshevik, and anti-Communistic line in Germany. It was quite natural to cooperate with states like Japan who didn't want Communistic activities and so on.

Whose idea was that pact ? Who eriginated the idea of that pact?

A. Well, I don't really know. How did it come about? The Fuehrer occasionally saw the apanese. I saw them quite often. We have then an anti-Cointern place in Berlin, an institution which was called the anti-Comintern. While out of this, the whole thing more or less originated, it was an idea which more or less came in discussion with the Fuehrer and with me and with the 'apanese. We wanted to have good relations with the Japanese. The Fuehrer once told me - this really dates back as far as '33 -- that he would like to have good relations with Japan, and that he believed 'apan to be a nation with which one could have good relations and so on. That dated back quite a long way. So this sort of thing gradually developed and that is the way we came to the anti-'omantern past.

- Q. I must speak rather pointedly. You and I were acquainted in Berlin and you have been the foreign Minister of Germany, experienced in diplomacy. You do not expect me to believe that so impresent a step was taken simply for reasons of ideology. I accept your statement in some large part, but it is impossible for me to believe that so important a step in foreign policy could be taken on those grounds, alone. There must have been the thought of considerations, which I describe as balance of power. You can describe them how you will, but you understand what am talking about.
- A. That may be so, but there was nothing really, let us say, purely political, which came out of it. You see, it came this way. I remember that I talked to the British Foreign Minister than one day about it, and we were very much anti-Bolshevik and Anti-Soviet. As a matter of fact, anti-Comintern, let us say. I remember talking to this inglish Foreign Minister and telling him, after that pact had been closed, the anti-Comintern pact, that it was perfectly open for Great Britian to join, for instance. I remember that. I should like to say this: it was the idea of the Further of establishing a general anti-Communistic front, more or less.
- Q. So far as Great Britian is concerned, there had been an Anglo-Japanese alliance until 1922 ?
- A. Yes.
- Q. The had been in open alliance with Japan until 1922 ?
- much. They did not want to take an attitude in the matter, I remember that.
- Q. Was the Foreign Office a participant, or did the Foreign Office know that this was going on ?
- A. I couldn't tell you exactly about that. I know one thing for sure, that it was signed, I think, by myself, on a particular order of the Fuehrer, but I am sure the Fuehrer discussed it with the Foreign Minister von Neurath.

- Q. What "as Germany's earlier policy in the Far East with regards to C ina, for example?
- A. Well, there was a policy, of course, of where we had good relations, as far as I remember, with China.
- Q. Hitler ordered the withdrawal of the German military missions in China in '38, according to my recollection. However, these precise facts are not what I am endeavoring to establish, but I am troubled about this situation: the anti-Comintern pact marked a very definite change in Germany's relations with Russia. Up to that time, German relations with Russia had been marked by the reopolo policy and, concurrently, Germany had maintained markedly friendly relations with China.

 The anti-Comintern pact reversed both of these important lines of policy. Therefore, I am exceedingly surprised to have you characterize the anti-Comintern pact as almost altogether ideological and without much political significance.
- A. One can say this: with the getting into power of the National Socialism, the Reppolo policy, I mean with the antogonism between the Weltauffassungen, would come to an end, which came up in the "Parteitag" in '33 when very hard speeches were made against Bolshevism. So I think one can say that the change of policy toward Russia -- later on, China -- could be marked down with the 3rd of January, 1933, when it started, and the anti-Comintern pact of '36 was a consequence, you see of this fundamental divergency between the Communistic and the National Socialistic doctrine, which I later tried to, in '39 overbridge again and try to get Russia in an entirely new line. But at that time, I think it is not wrong to say, that the fundamental part was the question of would perception and, of course, it is no doubt that having these two Weltauffassungen standing againt each other, that there is a political element in that. There is no doubt that about that. So far as that is concerned, there is no doubt that the anti-Comintern pact had a political element of some kind, but more in the way of what was very much in the mind of the Fuehrer at that time -- it is very difficult to explainan idea which the Fuehrer always had in mind, for creating a world front against Communistic activities everywhere. That was one of his fundamental ideas, really, which perhaps to a certain extent, also played a role later on in the German-Russian war of '41.
- v. I just offer you this hypothesis; That a political pact was contemplated between Germany and Japan --

- A. Then ?
- Q. Yes -- that this was intended, but it could hardly be called a non-aggression pact, because the two countries were far apart; and so Raumer had this bright idea of calling it an anti-Comintern pact because the Soviet Government had recently declared that the Comintern was not an official organ of the Soviet Government. Do not these remarks of mine stir up some recollections?
- A. It is quite possible that Raumer said that name first. I think he had some connection with the anti-Comintern, it is possible, the anti-Comintern action, but he didn't create the name because the name was there. The name was there as an action with an office (SIC), I think, which was attached to either the Propagands Ministry or some other thing. That is where the name came from.
- Q. You wouldn't say that the name was more or less a false facade. I say more or less because I recognize some justice in your earlier remarks, but wasn't it a fasades to cover up what was really a plain, everyday balance of power treaty between Germany and Japan?
- A. I don't think that is what it was. It wasn't a disguise pact, but there is no doubt that, in general, there was the idea of having good relations with Japan. That is the way I think it came about, that we came to the Weltanschaung pact or the anti-Comintern, but it is quite possible that Raumer mentioned that first. That is quite possible, but I don't think he created it because there was always this anti-Comintern action, which was there. You see, I remember discussing with the Fuehrer later on, that it would be very good and useful, if Great Britian would enter a thing like I remember that, But the English din't want it at that time. One thing is quite right, that it had its political elements, there is no doubt. It is a change I wouldn't say a change, but it was a consequence of the change of policy of 1933, you see, which came with the arrival of National Socialism, which then, of course, was anti-Communistic. This was the first step. You know, later on quite a number of other countries joined it. Italy joined it and a number of others.
- Q. Tell us about the Bureau Ribbentrop. I don't know what her that was its official title, you know what mean.
- A. That wasn't the official tile. It was called that. I think I have explained before about the Bureau Ribeentrop. It was an office, let us say, a part of the "ational Socialistic Party, which really consisted of myself and, perhaps I don't know, perhaps a dozen collaborators or something like that, with a number of other perple who had, during those years, looked after, so to speak, the semi-official, not official, channels of relationships with various foreign countries. For instance, we specialized, really, on England and France in these years. That is to say, with France, to get good relations with France, and good relations with Great Britian. That was more or less the chief object, I would like to say, of the Bureau Ribbentrop in those years.

- Q. But it also occupied itself with the Japanese questions?
- A. It occupied itself also with Japanese questions, to a certain extent, but I don't think very much. Then to a certain extent with Polish questions, but that was only later, I think: and with, perhaps one or two or three other countries. I wouldn't say it was really formed, but it came about that way.

 I was a collaborator of the Fuehrer in foreign politics since 1933 and as I wanted to have some place where to sit, that is how it really came about. I got a number of rooms in the Party office of Hess, at that time, Deputy of the Fuehrer, in the Whilhelmstrasse. I got a number of rooms where and I got a number of collaborators. Raumer, which you mentioned, was one of them. From where I made my trips, especially to Paris and London, but they were the chief trips really, I think, where I went in order to try and establish between relations with France and England. You know, of course, that we were in those years very much after and tried to get, the Angle-German alliance; that was really the main object.
- Q. Well, in effect, in became official later ?
- A. Well, it had no official position, no. I became official after 1934 when I moved over to the Foreign Office in 1934. I don't know whether you know that. When I was made Disarmament Commissioner, I moved over in '34 to the Foreign Office, but the Bureau Ribbentrop as you called it, that remained there and looked after these sort of semi-official relations with Anglo-German fellowship, Committee France-Allemagne.
- Q. However, they negotiated, or assisted you to negotiate this treaty with Japan.
- A. That is right.

- A. Let me see, this was handled with the Japanese Embassy in Berlin. I had, of course, use of the code as Disarmament Commissioner in the Foreign Office, but the Bureau Ribbentrop didn't have any code, not the code of the Foreign Office.
- Q. OSHIMA was the Japanese military attache ?
- A. Yes.
- was Dirksen, was it not?
- A. I think so.
- Q. Dirksen succeeded you in London, didn't he ?
- A. Yes.
